Site Data

This is situated at the east end of the hill of Coney Garth beyond the wooded area. It consists of oolitic limestone. The exposed face is weathers and is partly covered by vegetation. It is about five metres long and stands about two metres high at the maximum. In wet weather the water drains through limestone at here and at other points on the north side of the emerges as a line of springs. It has evidently proved necessary to create some land drains in the fields below to clear it. There is a large oak tree growing in the quarry which indicates that it must have had an origin at least in the 18th century.

History Summary

A quarry shown only on the 1890 map but aerial photos show evidence of quarry working.
