Site Data

The wall contains the water feature of Appleby Carr and measures 422m in length running in a rough semicircle from GR 433737 458312 at the southern point to GR 433680 458443 at the northern point and then in another rough semicircle back to the southern point. There is a modern vehicle gate at the southeast at GR 433754 458318. The historic original entrance survives at the east at GR 33783 58354. It is 2.6m wide and some of the original cast iron hinge brackets are still in place on the north side. The wall varies in height with a maximum of 2.0m and a width of 0.5m. It collapsed in places and missing altogether in others. In areas on the west side it has had silt tipped behind it much of which has spilled to obscure the wall at some points. It is associated with a ring of mature trees which has been planted on the inside. The wall is composed of rough cut magnesium limestone and sandstone blocks with some cobbles. It is lime mortared and in places there is a herringbone style finish. The line of the wall is stepped at intervals and there are occasional buttresses designed to strengthen the structure. There are only occasional through stones and some flat coping stones survive in places. It is only partially coursed and the general appearance suggests that the structure was functional rather than ornamental. At GR 433658 458433 at the north western extent is a large buttress style structure built into the wall and associated with a water inlet feature. At the northern extent at GR 433755 458431 is another large projecting buttress composed of finer cut sandstone. There is a gap in the centre of about 5m with two large mature trees growing in it.

History Summary

The field boundary on which this wall is situated has existed from mid 19th century to the present day, early 21st century.
